Description of the course	The course develops academic writing skills by focussing on argumentative essays and cause/effect essays, both very common in writing in psychology. Students are taught various linguistic resources used in argumentative writing and cause/effect writing, as well as specific transition signals used in such writing. The course also covers various discussion topics, such as modern addictions and contemporary psychological issues related to digital communication, e.g. cyberbullying and different forms of psychological violence through online communication and through social media. An additional topic is also the psychology of making decisions. The language focus of the course is on the use of verbal structures such as infinitives, gerunds, and participles, as well as the use of modal verbs. During the course students are required to analyse a scientific journal article on a topic in psychology from a grammatical point of view, and at the end of the semester students present the paper to their colleagues through an oral presentation and/or workshop.
Learning outcomes of the course	Students will be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>– plan different steps in writing cause/effect academic essays</li> <li>– explain the main properties of argumentative and cause/effect essays and their components</li> <li>– follow the logical organisation of ideas in writing about arguments, and cause and effect</li> <li>– talk and write about addictions and addictive behaviour, as well as about the relationship between psychology and contemporary digital communication</li> <li>– use infinitives, gerunds and modal verbs in English</li> <li>– express attitude or stance by using ‘marked’ words and expressions</li> <li>– use phrases and transition signals in writing about cause and effect in English</li> <li>– prepare and deliver an effective workshop in English in an academic environment</li> <li>– use psychology-related technical vocabulary in speaking and</li> </ul>
